some of the Mongol intellectuals have become extremely resentful of the Chinese Communist regulation placing most of the Mongol leagues and banners under the control of provincial administrations dominated by Chinese. The Mongols have been allowed self-government in segregated areas only, and have not been allowed to incorporate themselves with the Inner Mongolian Autonomous Government (IAG). The national revolutionary group have become especially indignant, and have begun to encourage the people to resist the Chinese Communists both directly and indirectly.

the IWAG sent two officers to Nanking and Shanghai to hire some primary school teachers. These men were CHUNG Ch'i (鍾祺), a native of Kiangsu who has been assigned to the Ulanbatai and Yehcho Leagues to direct activities in Mongolia, and PAI Yen (白彦) (? Bayan), a Mongol. CHUNG was in reality in charge of everything. They were gone for more than a month, and took back five Chinese teachers. They had rejected all Mongol applicants, as well as those recommended to them by the East China College and various government agencies in Nanking.

[redacted] the Mongol forces under Prince Te carried on several guerrilla campaigns, and advanced as far as Pailingmiao and areas on the Mongolian border. At the beginning of the fall of 1950 they were facing difficulties because of the shortage of arms and foodstuffs. The desert region of Mongolia produces almost no foodstuffs apart from a few cows, sheep, horses and camels. Prince Te was unwilling to exhaust the resources of his poverty-stricken compatriots, and as a result copied Chinese Communist tactics, dividing his forces into small scattered units which were to carry on guerrilla activities independently as circumstances permitted. Te himself, with a few followers, has remained in the desert area. In spite of the difficulties facing them, the morale of the Racial Mongol group is good, and the people have increasing confidence in them.
